Although the Magic are starting to get on a roll, don't expect them to win big on Tuesday. Not only did they have a harder than expected game in Toronto Monday night, using six players for 31+ minutes, but Orlando is a terrible bet when giving more than eight points, going 3-12 ATS as a heavy favorite since last March. Two of those non-covers were against Charlotte. Orlando is 2-10 ATS this season versus teams that force 14 or fewer turnovers per game.

Despite four straight SU wins, the Celtics (3-11 ATS in February) still aren't quite right. They nearly blew a home game to New York on Sunday, covering only because the game went to overtime, and they needed a desperation three to force OT. The Rockets have owned Boston in recent years, winning three in a row, SU and ATS, against the Celtics. Houston has won its past three SU in Boston, its past five ATS in Beantown, and nine of its last 10 ATS there.

SF Carmelo Anthony has started to mesh nicely into the line-up, and PG Baron Davis has emerged as a suitable back-up to Jeremy Lin. Unlike the Boston and Miami defenses, the Mavs don't have the defenders to smother the pick-and-roll. The Knicks stormed back to beat the Mavs in New York two weeks ago, and they have a chance to do it again facing a Mavs team that could be without starting C Brendan Haywood, who sprained his ankle Monday.
